Stratigraphic units and samples and the problem of contaminated sites Abstract In recent years there has been an increasing interest in the study of the transfer processes of contamination from the uppermost and more superficial layers of the soil down to the depth that have been defined as poorly permissive. Only a few studies have looked at the relationship between the type of soil and the depth at which most of the contamination takes place. From this work, it has been observed that the study of the contaminant transfer in the environment shows that the medium type matters less than the depth where it has happened. This has been explained in terms of the depth where the strata are common and are the most permeable. Because these strata are at a lower depth than that where the least permeable strata belong, it is possible that the contamination is transported by other processes than leaching by the rain, and this has been confirmed by the fact that most of the contamination is found in the lower three-fourths of the soil. More from the Author Some soils may contain deposits that are more permeable than others. This is a serious problem because these deposits release an excessive amount of contaminant from the soil. This not only causes pollution from the soil but also affects the environment. This problem is more acute in porous soils, such as clays and alluviums. The use of landfills requires a lot of land. One alternative to landfills is to substitute the solid waste for soil and use it in land reclamation. This is an option for low-value items, as the value of the product exceeds the cost of the soil. The use of landfills requires land. Three alternative sites were used for the implementation of a problem of depth migration of chemical compounds. They were: a landfill, an old landfill, and a polluted site. This is a problem of depth migration of chemical compounds. The form is that of groundwater table contamination. In the case of the landfill it is very plausible that contaminant has been easily removed by leaching from the superficial layers. The fraction that has not been removed in landfill has migrated deeper. Nearly half of all landfills created from the 1980s to the 1990s have exceeded design capacity. The main reason for their construction was the fact that the existing numbers of landfills were insufficient to meet the demand from society. Of the approximately 2 million landfills in the United States, today there are about 1.9
