The chicken egg as a biocontainment apparatus. We describe the generation and use of a biosafety level 3 containment system to rapidly produce infectious allantoic fluid, from which is derived infectious chick embryo derived virus (CEDV). CEDV has been known since 1957 as a zoonotic pathogen (nephritis) and thus the containment apparatus was deliberately designed so that a biohazard incident could be defined and evaluated in a manner that would minimize the possibility of human exposure. The work demonstrates that it is possible to generate quantities of infectious allantoic fluid in a controlled biohazard environment. From the containment apparatus, we successfully produced 10 plaque-forming units per millilitre (PFU/ml) of a suspension of infectious CEDV, for a total infectious stock of 6.5×10^6 PFU. Skip links strawberry & pumpkin tart with walnut pastry cream As we get closer to autumn here in north east England, the urge to be a bit more home comfy kicks in! Whilst mulling over what to make, I thought it might be nice to make a tart that is easy to make and would be great for the cold months (and something different from the more normal apple tart). I thought I might make a red leaf tart, but soon decided against this. Displays are commonly used to display images to users in a variety of different situations. For example, retail stores use displays to attract customers and display merchandise for customers to browse. Traditional images on video displays, such as large-screen televisions, home projectors, computers, video game consoles, smartphones, and tablet computers, are often times static in nature, requiring a large investment on the part of the owner to set up the display and/or to maintain the display. Specifically, display owners have to expend resources to assemble the display, program the display, maintain the display, and the like. Such displays are ill suited for many situations. time. "Make sure that the teacher understands and doesn't just give them a test," she says. "It's also important to let them know that taking the test doesn't guarantee them a better grade." A strategic approach Strategic planning is another key component of the curriculum. "If we do it well, it shouldn't feel like work," says Libra. "We need to teach them about the multiplication table, to build their foundation as students. We're constantly thinking about how to go about this in the best way to prepare them." In addition to the state-mandated curriculum, students are given a yearly "cascade," which is essentially a report card. They get 10 percent for each grade, and each of the areas is weighted in certain ways to reflect how much each component was taught. AD The cascade, based on performance in reading and mathematics, is an important tool, for the teachers and the students. "We can look at it and see where the kids are at," says Libra. "If there's a hole in a kid's knowledge, we can help them fill it." When the students come back next year, there will be new classes to take, new teachers, new tests. The cascade will help them feel ready to learn. As for the kids themselves? Well, they have the five days to go over what they have learned from the previous year and forget as much as possible. They will probably get back into some of the classes at some point next year. But for now, the bevy of teachers and counselors will get to do their own thing. "You're having the best-of-the-best come in and show the kids the best that the world has to offer," says Libra.
