Erosion lesions of the posterior maxillary sinus in patients with asymmetric jaw growth: a systematic review. To systematically review published studies investigating the prevalence of maxillary posterior sinus septa in edentulous and dentate patients, and to analyze reported associations with dentation status, jaw development, gender, and underlying maxillary pathology. Peer-reviewed articles published between January 1950 and December 2014 were identified from the MEDLINE, Cochrane Central Register of Controlled Trials, Cochrane Oral Health Reviews, Embase, Scopus, Web of Science, and Cochrane Methodology Register (Cochrane Library) databases. All study designs were included, excepting randomized controlled trials. Articles reporting on the prevalence of maxillary posterior sinus septa in relation to edentulous versus dentate status, maxillary sinus anatomy, gender, or underlying maxillary pathologies were assessed. Primary data extraction, study quality assessment, and data analysis were performed independently by 2 review authors. Non-English language articles were translated by professional translators. Results of the quality assessment were analyzed separately by 2 separate review authors. A total of 60 articles were identified (32 English language articles and 28 foreign language articles). A total of 15 studies met the predefined quality criteria and were included in the meta-analysis. All studies reporting on the prevalence of maxillary posterior sinus septa in edentulous versus dentate status were observational, with cross-sectional study designs. Most studies were performed in Japanese dentate populations with a sample size of 35 to 550 subjects. None of the 10 studies in dentate patients found an increased prevalence of septa in the edentulous and full dentate states. In edentulous patients, 2 studies found a significantly increased septa prevalence, and 8 studies found no difference between edentulous and dentate patients. Quality assessment in 8 foreign language studies revealed a moderate to high

What's new:

WORK Clinics and workshops will be held outside Ireland this year with the seed funding that helps creatives become creators. A café set up in the car park of a housing estate in Stoke on Trent regularly hosts a variety of events but the organisers expect this year's to be the most varied yet. The property developers behind the venue have invested in sustainability and recycling and the café is even headed by a tertiary student - who has studied sustainable tourism management. Rozars long-running event worker's sessions will this year feature debates and sessions on activism, from something done for purely practical reasons like organising a petition to a peace protest. The theme will also be 'occupy' and the organisers expect to see plenty of 'occupy' representations. A youth environment centre hosted in a former caravan in England will offer several discussion groups. The Bio researchers conference this year will take place in the centre and green consultancy firm ebbi will hold its Magna Carta Green Lab in a local education centre with a neighbouring secondary school. But perhaps the most exciting event on the drawing board is the world premiere of Posh Paranoid The Musical, a musical comedy inspired by events surrounding the syringe dump trials. The musical will be accompanied by two workshops for teenage girls interested in making their own videos about health and drugs. Other workshops will be held in both Ireland and England by a variety of organisations working in the field of sustainability. And in a respite from all this fun, there will also be a series of brain power unravellers workshops, including one on the subject of sustainable transportation from the organisers of the Outdoor Director, and an event created by Creative Roots where attendees will get to draw outside all day. The organisers of the Ink festival have done a lot of thinking and planning to create something very different next year. There will be some familiar events, such as the lantern parade and an awards ceremony, but next year the festival will be centred around the family. "There'll be an entire workshop stage that's very family orientated, with a complete festival in the family zone." Entrance is free and music festivals these days are trying a lot of new things, such as a number of festivals that are all based in urban areas. “An urban festival on a dinky bus is not an option for next year, it’s something we’
