The objective of this work is to study the metabolism of leucine and the incorporation of the beta-enol from this amino acid into acyl-CoA esters, peptides, and other products in the cultured hepatoma cells. Recent studies by our group revealed that the beta-enol is used in the synthesis of ATP in the hepatoma cells. In addition, we found that leucine stimulates deacylation of coenzyme A and its import into the mitochondria. We will study these phenomena using liver and hepatoma cells. In addition, we will study the rate limiting step of the pathway to produce ATP and the role of leucine in regulation of beta-enol-CoA formation and degradation. This will be studied by investigating the effect of several precursor and product analogs on the metabolic pathway. In addition, we will study the effect of 1-valerate on the metabolism of leucine in order to understand the mechanism of the inhibition of the process. In addition, we will study the effect of leucine on the rate of export of the beta-enol-CoA into the mitochondria.
