“The team was able to create the most realistic motion capture system available, giving players the freedom to play in every aspect of the game the way they do in the real world,” explained Head of FIFA’s Gameplay Development, Matt Prior. “Players can run and shoot, tackle and head-butt, dribble and perform all of the elements of a football match.” The challenge was not only to capture the movements of 22 players at once, but to ensure that all movements were authentic and would be a natural part of the game. “The challenge was to create mechanics that go beyond a motion capture system and become an integral part of the game experience,” said Senior Producer Dave Rutter. “So we tapped into everything players do in the real world that is relevant to the context of a football match. We gave them the most realistic and authentic football experience to date.” The new FIFA gameplay system was created using data from the players’ movements, collisions, and force feedback data. In total, there were over 300 data fields per player. In order to ensure that these movements and collisions were authentic, the data was captured using an extensive motion capture suit worn by 22 real-life players. Players did not notice the motion capture suit. The data from the motion capture suit was then woven into the Ego Engine and Animations, transforming the way players move on the pitch. “When we captured the data from the motion capture suit, we converted it into something else. We stripped the movement from something that was already known in order to create something completely new,” said Lead Animator Josh Sharp. “We use a layer of simulation that allows us to evolve any motions and movements that we have captured and apply them to gameplay.” The new gameplay system also provides players with a realistic and authentic simulation of the impacts of tackles, corner kicks, and game-changing shots. “We captured the real-world data that make a great football match into something completely new,” said Lead Visual Effects Engineer Glenn Pittman. “Not only did we capture the movements of 22 players, but we also used this new data to create realistic collisions. By reproducing the collisions that take place in the real world, players feel the impact of every hit. The collision fidelity makes players feel as if they’re truly in a live football match
