kazuo.imai@hit.edu.ne Pathophysiology of osteoporosis. Pathophysiology of osteoporosis.

Abbreviated review. J Bone Min Res 16(1):23-26, 2001. Osteoporosis is a multifactorial skeletal disease that is characterized by progressive bone loss, low bone mass, and increased susceptibility to fracture. Osteoporosis results in debilitating fractures that are increasing in numbers and frequency and are the leading cause of bone-related morbidity and mortality. The increased risk of fractures in the elderly may be associated with low bone mass, high bone turnover, or both. Despite its societal and economic implications, the treatment of osteoporosis is difficult, as both the disease and its treatment induce bone loss and are often associated with adverse skeletal events.

Osteoporosis is a major public health problem. Although mortality associated with fractures has been decreasing, it is still substantial, and in the United States, osteoporotic fractures account for more than 1.5 million hospitalizations each year and for more than 707,000 new fractures annually. Thus, bone loss in the elderly is a major concern and the prevention of osteoporosis has become an important issue. Moreover, both women and men suffer from an increased fracture risk in postmenopausal osteoporosis. Therefore, understanding of the pathophysiology of this disease has been greatly enhanced. Many lines of evidence indicate that estrogen deficiency plays a key role in the pathophysiology of osteoporosis. However, in this Possible reasons for increasing labour force participation by adult women. To determine whether labour force participation increased for adult women due to a decrease in wage disparity or from increases in job quality for women. Data from the 1977-1979 and 1997-1998 National Labour Force Surveys were pooled and the proportions of women age 16-64 who were in the labour force and worked were examined by age, race, education, ethnicity, marital status, and wage inequality. Analyses explored whether the increase in the percentage of women age 16-64 in the labour force was due to a decrease in the wage gap, increases in job quality, or both. Despite the increase in the proportion of women age 16-64 in the labour force, there was no decline in the wage gap between men and women, as measured by the male/female unemployment rate ratio. A greater proportion of women were employed in occupations associated with having a low wage disadvantage when compared to a low wage advantage, and these occupations increased between the two
