More particularly, the invention relates to a moisture-proofing power cable of the type having at least a layer comprising a combination of a water-proof non-conductive polypropylene compound and a moisture-proofing polyethylene compound embedded in a polyolefin compound. Cables used in the transmission of electrical power are susceptible to damage by moisture or water. Known cables include one formed of a water-proof polyolefin compound, such as a polyethylene compound or a polypropylene compound. However, the incorporation of a polyolefin compound into the cable structure causes chemical changes in the polyolefin compound. This is disadvantageous since the polyolefin compound subsequently absorbs moisture to alter electrical properties in the cable and hence the cable is no longer effective as a moisture-proof power cable.Re-evaluating second-order dynamics of one- and two-dimensional Fermi liquids in irradiated high-Tc superconductors. The ion-irradiation-induced non-Fermi liquid behavior of the layered cuprate superconductors is a topic of great current interest. Its understanding is crucial for shedding light on the
