Amazon Web Services is offering full and free access to its cloud computing service to the LGBT community. The move comes a little more than a week after Google announced its plans to give the same offer in response to a growing number of requests. Under the new terms of service, the technology giant agrees to provide free hosting to members of the LGBT community. Amazon announced that the move came after a request by the LGBT group organisation LGBT Recording Artists Coalition (LGBTRAC). The coalition had lobbied Amazon for the change, saying that its community had been "troubled for some time" because access to Microsoft's Office suite is available only to heterosexuals. The Department of Defense oversees the cloud computing program and had approved AWS to host federal agencies working under the contract, including the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, US National Archives, the US Air Force, NASA and the US Securities and Exchange Commission. LGBTRAC has also pointed out that the granting of free access to AWS would encourage some cloud computing firms to open their services to the LGBT community. As a result, such firms could at some stage find themselves having to shut their services to the general public. "As Amazon
