In this study, the cognitive abilities of a group of children with an associated non-verbal learning disability (NVLD) were compared to those of a group with other forms of learning disability. Both groups presented with a non-verbal IQ at or below 70, and both showed significantly poorer non-verbal IQ than the general population on the Test of Non-verbal Intelligence (TONI). The NVLD children were described by parents and teachers, and assessed for ability to focus, concentrate and complete tasks. The NVLD children received significantly higher raw scores
