Paris won't back down

PARIS — Four months after he presided over the United Nations Security Council's failure to come up with a plan to end the bloody civil war in Syria, U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki-moon said Monday that the U.N. is working on a much more ambitious plan. Ban says the world now lacks the time to pursue more modest goals in Syria. If the plan to end the violence is not credible, he says, then the U.N. will look at other measures. Just a few days after a handful of people were massacred in Paris, Ban spoke of a renewed "commitment from all to stem the flow of arms, provide security, support human rights, and end bloodshed." "Although the situation is grave," he said, "we have a last, best chance to stem this horrific violence. We will not rest until we stop the bloodshed." France's new President, François Hollande, has spoken of France's determination to take on responsibility "to end the bloodshed in Syria." But in the last years of the Obama administration, both the Pentagon and the State Department were pushing for a no-fly zone over Syria — a measure that could have made the civil war even worse. Ban's proposal — by far the most extensive peacemaking effort in the Syrian conflict — would create a "humanitarian safe zone" for refugees and for the rebels who are trying to drive out the forces of President

Bashar Assad. It is a counter-terrorism approach based on President Obama's strategy of "holding the line" on Iraq in the 1990s. In 2008, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton joined the Obama administration in saying the U.S. would not get involved in a sectarian fight between Sunnis and Shiites that was having a drastic effect on the politics of the Middle East and even on Europe. The rebels in Syria are mainly Sunni Muslims, but the main political and military
