Slices of Limulus ventral nerve cord were treated with pronase (proteinase K) and subsequently analyzed for their ability to activate "Lym-DNA" probes. The enzyme activity was found to be specific for the tissue (neural tissue) of origin. Proteolytic degradation of the tissue slices did not reveal an increase of endonuclease activity. The tissue-specific endonuclease activity was activated by 5'-phosphorylating reagents, such as alpha-2'-AMP or 5'-beta-S-phosphorothiolate. Owing to the cell wall of the polyphemus, divalent cations were not required for the reaction. The electrophoretic mobility of the activated DNA was similar to the digestion products resulting from treatment of "Lym-DNA" with Lym-REI. It is therefore concluded that Limulus ventral nerve cord endonuclease is a thymidine-specific endonuclease, with some distinction from the thymidine- and cytosine-specific endonucleases isolated from other tissues of the Limulus.
