In semiconductor manufacturing technology, it is frequently necessary to grow and select semiconductor crystals that have their qualities modified by creating nanostructures. A prominent example is the need to grow high quality light emitting semiconducting materials, particularly in the case of III-V and II-VI compound materials. The most commonly used technology for growing such materials is molecular beam epitaxy (MBE). In MBE, monocrystalline thin films of the desired materials are created on a high temperature heated substrate by a beam of metastable atoms or molecules evaporated from a heated source located remotely from the substrate. The MBE technique has proven quite successful for growing high quality, single crystal layers of some materials. However, the growth rate, the substrate temperature, and the necessary cleanliness for film growth can be very limiting, as each of these variables may require precise control of the MBE process and close monitoring to maintain the desired film quality. An alternative technique, known as organometallic vapor phase epitaxy (OMVPE), has emerged to minimize the limitations of MBE by providing very high growth rates, temperature independent growth and growth at lower substrate temperatures. In the OMVPE technique, organometallic precursors, usually in the form of trimethylgallium (TMG), triethylgallium (TEG) and triethylindium (TEI) are fed in the gas phase into a high temperature reaction chamber where they decompose and deposit on the substrate. The use of the organic compounds as a growth precursor allows the film to be grown at lower substrate temperatures. The growth rates of OMVPE are quite high, as much as 10
