chinese authorities detained the reporters of southern weekend for several weeks in late january 2016. the paper had been critical of the government's handling of the guangdong protests. according to the cpjs 2016 impunity index, a report released in march of that year, at least 50 journalists and media workers have been jailed in china in 2016 for "inciting subversion of state power". the cpj report, citing local sources, identified 20 journalists imprisoned for their coverage of the protests as well as 8 for their coverage of the march 15, 2016 military crackdown in xinjiang. although the countrys official motto is "liberty, equality, and fraternity," press freedom has never been a priority, and the government has a history of cracking down on human rights issues. journalists have been fired for reporting on state corruption, and internet users have been arrested for posting online comments deemed critical of the government. recent crackdowns have focused on "social media users," including those posting comments on microblogs, or "netizens," and on websites, including the online news publication southern weekend, which is known to report on human rights issues. in june 2013, the cpd organized a "strike action" against u.s. news sites to "express strong dissatisfaction with their 'disrespectful' and 'irresponsible'" reporting on china, according to foreign ministry spokeswoman hua chunying. that same month, chinese president xi jinping announced his "internet plus" program, a massive censorship effort to block websites that are not registered with the government. this includes nearly all overseas websites, but increasingly includes sites linked to news media in hong kong. 5ec8ef588b
