The TOEFL is an English language test that is required to be taken by all international students wishing to study in an English-speaking country. The test is given by a native speaker, and is designed to test a student's ability to listen, read, write and speak English, and is used to judge a student's grasp of the language. However, it has become a universally-accepted standard, and is considered to be the entrance examination for a large number of international schools around the world. Before sitting the TOEFL, it is important that you prepare well for the test. Although you do not need to score a certain number of points to be accepted to your university, there are certain aspects of the test that you will be aiming to score well on. The writing and listening sections of the TOEFL have a broad range of different essays, and the reading section has several passages that require you to read complicated academic content. The speaking section, on the other hand, tests your ability to deliver a speech in front of an audience and to answer questions posed to you. In the event that you have observed that the TOEFL Speaking type is an important place of interest for you and you are searching for a more in-depth training in this area, I suggest you take a gander at the ESL Audio Processing: The Substance

Behind the TOEFL Speaking type course. This is an on-line course made for TOEFL candidates from around the globe.
