The tale this year is much the same as last year - repairing (albeit in-house) a complex Darkroom chainsaw project. I've been using the software for 10 years now, and the last 5 without a large photo of any kind in the 'program' - I'm a little wary of the changes in the new version though - mainly the new 'convert to PSD' feature - is this going to go wrong more often than the last one?!

For the past two decades - especially in the iD ten years ago, we have talked about creating a small camera that we build and deliver to Pixellate. We gave it a name Processor and a concept to deliver a small, high-res, image sensor powerful enough to feed a professional editor's workflow. The Adobe competition was a road map and an accelerator, telling us how to build it and what it should achieve. It allowed us to test early versions of the camera and to be guided by real customers' judgment and experience. It enabled us to refine the design and deliver it as a real product. We're not building it alone - we've got the dedicated team across our several labs and across groups. We're working in partnership with Huawei, our delivery partner, and with our community for the final polish and refinement. This is a feature that exists in the app - and to do this, we're going to massively scale the capabilities of the Instagram SDK, and combine that with our deep expertise in machine learning to deliver a powerful, AI-powered camera. We will be launching it through our partners, and then our own channels. This is the dream of a powerful camera in the palm of your hand, but we're also excited to bring it to market in 2020. The camera will be available on a range of platforms. 933d7f57e6
