Invention The invention is in the field of electrochemical conversion cells, specifically fuel cells. 2. Description of Related Art A fuel cell is an electrochemical cell that directly converts chemical energy produced by a reaction into electrical energy. The primary elements of a fuel cell are an anode, a cathode, and an electrolyte (or membrane) that separates the anode and cathode. The electrolyte is a ceramic or polymer film that permits a cation, typically hydrogen cations, to migrate through the membrane. Fuel cells can be arranged in a number of different architectures. In a series fuel cell, the chemical reaction occurs in each fuel cell but the individual fuel cells are electrically isolated from each other in a series-connected configuration. In a parallel fuel cell, the individual fuel cells share a common electrolyte and are connected in parallel with other parallel-connected fuel cells to increase the overall power output. A fuel cell stack is a collection of fuel cells that are electrically connected together in a series or parallel configuration.

Reactants, such as hydrogen and oxygen, or a gaseous hydrogen-containing reformat, are supplied to the anode and cathode of the fuel cell, respectively. The oxygen anode reaction is typically an oxygen-reduction reaction, although in some designs the oxygen anode reaction may be a proton-reduction reaction. The oxygen anode reaction is described by the following half-cell reaction:
