See the screenshots below for more details: See also: See also: North Korea has tested short-range ballistic missiles on four separate occasions in recent weeks, alarming experts who fear the isolated state may be preparing for an all-out launch. South Korea's Ministry of National Defense released satellite images on Saturday that show North Korea firing a number of ballistic missiles. North Korea has consistently advanced its missile program and is believed to have successfully developed a miniaturized nuclear weapon, capable of fitting on its arsenal of ballistic missiles. Experts believe that the launches this month are a show of power ahead of the possible test of a nuclear weapon, or the placing of a nuclear warhead on a missile. The country tested a short-range ballistic missile on July 29, and it flew around 800 miles, according to officials. The next day, North Korea fired a ballistic missile about 100 miles north of Japan's southernmost island of Okinawa. The missile landed in the Pacific Ocean. On July 31, the nation conducted its first underground test of a missile that could hit US cities, or locations in the Western Pacific. The launch came as UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon met with North Korea's foreign minister and the country's ambassador to the United States to discuss various issues, including the sanctions imposed on North Korea over its nuclear weapons. The missile was launched on July 28 from a site near the east coast and flew about 310 miles, according to South Korea's Joint Chiefs of Staff. The missile had a maximum range of about 180 miles, but experts believe the
