Glenn Meta In the last decade, many U.S. companies have been acquired by foreign firms, and the policy of allowing or encouraging these mergers is sometimes cited as a potential source of U.S. job losses. Some of these U.S. firms have been quite large, with American headquarters staff numbering in the thousands. The principal figure is S. Lant Pritchett, who in 2002 calculated that over 10 million jobs were directly lost to the U.S. economy by acquisitions. Others have claimed even higher figures, while the more cautious Economist Intelligence Unit has suggested the net job loss might be less than one million, although it is worth noting that some of the lost jobs may be replaced by firms hiring workers to replace those who were laid off. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the total number of jobs held by employees of American companies was 140 million in 2014, and the number employed by foreign firms was 23 million. The same release also mentioned one U.S. job loss that was offset by the hiring of 1,760 foreign employees. The report defined an "acquisition" as "any merger, acquisition, or divestiture of any company or part thereof." It said these figures were based on the "initial acquisition" and did not account for subsequent changes in ownership, such as stock splits or changes in the company's management. The Bureau of Labor Statistics in 2018 released a report on mergers that noted that U.S. companies had acquired 27,000 U.S. firms in 2018, a decline of 0.6% from the previous year. The average firm that was acquired had a staff of 12.6 and the majority were small, single location firms. The study also looked at job displacement resulting from these acquisitions. It found that 5.7% of all acquired U.S. firms — one out of every 18 — were shut down by the acquisition. In addition, the study found that 1.3% of all jobs of acquired U.S. firms were lost as a result of the acquisition. Furthermore, the study found that foreign acquirers had displaced U. 2edc1e01e8

A patient with left ventricular assist device developed cyanosis and hypotension during a left ventricular assist device exchange procedure in which a faulty ventricular balloon was discovered. Cyanosis was thought to be due to either a misplaced large central venous catheter, the left ventricular assist device or its associated cannulas. Because of increased hemoglobin and total pressure transudate during the procedure, the patient's left ventricular assist device was removed. During the postoperative course, the patient died of intracerebral hemorrhage. ----- sschueller Before I started learning Javascript I used to spend 10-15 hours a day
