Even outside a smartphone, these users also like the brand names that accompany their iOS devices. Android users have been drawn to Motorola -- the company has been at or near the top of smartphone sales for years -- and are giving Google's Pixel brand a try. PC users, meanwhile, like Microsoft (despite their growing weakness in the core PC business) because they know they don't have to switch devices to use their softwares and the companies' own operating systems. On paper, it looks like Android has the upper hand; it is the most popular operating system, and has been so for most of the past decade. Samsung, one of Android's biggest parts suppliers, is the world's largest smartphone manufacturer. The truth is, I've never tested an application as heavily as Adobe's products, which makes me a bit of a wonderment. I think RAM is the most crucial attribute to consider when purchasing a computer, because new software means more apps using more memory, eating up more RAM, and slowing things down. With that in mind, I'll include a "RAM" category on this review. A good look at memory performance starts in our memory testing, which we'll get to next. I've covered this before, but it's important for a refresher: The best upgrades are internal build-to-order parts that feel as though they're custom-built for your own particular needs. This includes the CPU speed and pathway speeds on the motherboard, as well as the amount of RAM in the box. Most of that is dictated by your requirements and the look you want from your computer, rather than by the manufacturer, though. At that point, the only consideration is performance, and not necessarily your budget.
