The CLP-325 is an imaging drum unit that requires the previous driver to reset for it to be used with the NextCLP 3185/3186Aging and lower body lifting in human females. Human females (n = 69) performed constant-speed lifting movements (L) and constant-speed isometric leg extensions (LE) of equal duration (1, 2, 3, or 5 s) to lifting loads (13, 26, 41, and 61 kg) to maximal voluntary isometric voluntary (MVIV) strength. As MVIV strength decreased, lifting performance characteristics (e.g., initial and cumulative isometric L/LE velocity, time to peak, peak load, and lifting velocity) of the females increased with an increase in the lifting load. Females were also able to perform L and LE with very high ratings of perceived exertion (RPE) and oxygen consumption (V.O2) as compared with MVIV strength scores. However, as lifting load increased, lifting performance characteristics and RPE and V.O2 scores increased, as expected, but RPE and V.O2 scores were well within the MVIV strength limit of a 4.0 (median) which serves as a maximum acceptable level of RPE and V.O2 in routine daily activities. A significant correlation was found between RPE and V.O2, indicating that females may use RPE for a rapid indicator of V.O2 or muscle fatigue levels during a lifting task. The ability to perform L and LE was present in well over 50% of the older females (M > 52 yrs) with no gender difference in lifting performance. These data indicate that older female human females are capable of performing L and LE movements at nearly MVIV strength levels, indicating that the design of lifting devices should allow for a wider range of movement within the components, not just a maximal isometric force. The present invention is concerned with the field of network computing devices and networks. The invention concerns the prioritization
