The author undertook a case-control study, nested within a retrospective cohort, to identify risk factors for tuberculosis among adult patients in a family medicine clinic. Previous studies, few of which were conducted in a family medicine context, have indicated the importance of host-specific risk factors in the pathogenesis of tuberculosis. The investigator, a family practitioner, hypothesized that host and environmental factors and comorbid illnesses increase the risk of tuberculosis in the clinic population. A chart review of all adult patients who had tuberculosis between 1992 and 1998 revealed cases nested within a cohort of 452 noncases. After a multivariate analysis was performed using conditional logistic regression, the following statistically significant predictors of tuberculosis were identified: current or past history of intraven
